Psychoanalysis and Racial Laws at School

Jewish Museum

"Carlo and Vera Wagner"

Via del Monte, 5, Trieste TS

The Carlo and Vera Wagner Jewish Museum in Trieste, located at Via del Monte 5/7, was inaugurated in 1993 by the Jewish Community with the support of the Wagner-De Polo family. It houses silverwares (the oldest dating back to 1593), textiles, books and furnishings from the ancient synagogues of Trieste. The building, formerly a hospital and then a shelter for Jewish refugees in transit, includes an Ashkenazi oratory, active from 1920 to 1987. The Holocaust section displays personal effects returned only in 2000. Refurbished in 2014-15, it offers multimedia content, a conference room, and panels also in English.

Edoardo Weiss's

psychoanalytic practice

Via S. Lazzaro, 8, Trieste

Around 1919, psychologist Edoardo Weiss opened his private practice in Trieste. His famous patients included poet Umberto Saba and painter Arturo Nathan. Weiss and his wife, Vanda Schrenger, were the first to introduce psychoanalysis to Italy, maintaining close ties with Sigmund Freud. The presence of psychoanalysis in the city also inspired the writer Italo Svevo (Ettore Schmitz), who used it as a narrative device - not without a satirical note - in novels such as Zeno's Conscience.

Historic headquarters of the Petrarca High School

Viale Venti Settembre, 26, Trieste

Founded in 1912 as the "Ginnasio Superiore Comunale Francesco Petrarca." In 1938, like all Italian schools, it expelled Jewish teachers and students. In 2018, in collaboration with the University of Trieste, the Jewish Museum of Trieste, and the State Archives of Trieste, the school inaugurated the exhibition "Racism in the Classroom," which recounts these dramatic events.
